A LIMITED EDITION OF

MINARD

DUE OUT ON 6th JULY

A great chance to discover Minard's past from one of its sons

Mac Turner's recall of his youth in Minard prompted him into providing a record of these days. He includes mention of folk he knew, local customs and buildings, life before the arrival of electricity and mains water supply, the demise of fishing and quarrying industries, the rise of Forestry Commission work, and the inescapable impacts of World War Two on the whole community.

This insight into life in a small Scottish village during a period of considerable change is well supported with diagrams and photographs.

From the text:

...Today it is unlikely that local lads when roaming the beaches would be hailed from a fishing boat with the shout “Seen the whale?”

...A mouth-blown pitch pipe was used to give the appropriate note to start the class singing. The pupils called it the ‘dootrack’.

...The rails for the crane and the bogies, the various quarry buildings and even the foundations for the heavy machinery, have been cleared away, as has also most of a solid structure called the Tip.

...Standing at our front door with my father that Sunday, looking at this large vessel steaming past and bearing the crying of the children on board, is seared in my memory. They were the first evacuees from Glasgow.
